For too long the narrative in our community has centered on the needs of the business class, while more than half of all other residents in Redding are struggling just to maintain their position on or around the poverty line. Too many of us are living paycheck to paycheck, stuck in unaffordable housing situations, one small crisis away from homelessness with no foreseeable way out. This is unacceptable. If elected I will advocate and fight for all of Redding, not just the few.

I am a father, a student, a worker, and a community organizer. It's because of the responsibilities of each of these roles that has led me to believe I am the person to bring a fresh outlook and new solutions to old city politics.

As a father, putting food on the table is an ever-present worry and responsibility, one in which failure is not an option.

As a student, I have intimate knowledge of our city's lack of education, resources and employment opportunities.

As a worker, I understand the strain placed on our employees and the expectations that require them to put their lives at risk every day for little to no compensation.
